A Fortunate Parishan Journalist—A Single Act of Kindness Gains a Fortune. The Paris correspondent of the New Orleans Delta writes in his last letter:

Orleans Delta writes in his last letter:

One of our Parisian journalists, who was present at the first representation of a new comedy, has now substantial cause to congratulate himself upon the kindly impulse which prompted him to offer an exchange of places with an old gentleman occupying an orchestra stall near by, journal the venerable stranger was suffering to such an extent as to be on the point of leaving the theater, our good-natured con frers (only journalists, in France, are capable of self-sacrificing politeness) insisted upon giving up his seat, which, after a little hesitation, the invalid accepted, with a grateful smile. In less than five minutes, "Items," absorbed in the play, had forgotten all about the matter, and left the theater at the close of the new piece.

Some days aubsequently, our literary gentleman had occasion to call upon a friend, residing in a "sky-parlor" of a house in the rue de Richelieu. After a brief visit, he started down stairs, but just as he reached the first-story landing, a mian dressed in black issued hurridly from a door at the head of the stairway and jostled against him. The involuntary aggressor instantly begged pardon, and had aiready descended half way to the street, when he came to a sudden pause, and, turning toward the journalist, demanded if he had "half an hour to lose?"

"In what way?" demanded the other, in some surprise.

"You can do me a service," replied the

To can do see a service, replied the stranger, "which will be worth a hundred francs to you, as a witness to a will. A person whom I had requested to be present, in that capacity, has not arrived, and I must find some one to replace him."

"You call that losing half an hour!" exciaimed the journalist. "I accept, with infinite pleasure."

Without another word, the gentleman in black, who was a notary, led the way into the apartment whence he had issued a moment before, and the journalist presently found himself in agumptously furnished chamber. Around the bed of the sick man, whose features could be dimly seen through the half-drawn curtains, were seated two or three other persons, also summoned as witnesses to the instrument about to be executed. The business was soon dispatched, and nothing remained but the apposition of the signatures. As the journalist, approached the bedside, to write his name, the testator caught a full view of his countenance.

bedside, to write his name, the testator caught a full view of his countenance.

"Do you not recognize me?" said the latter, in a feeble whisper.

"I have a faint recollection of having met you," replied the journalist, "but I really can not say where."

"Let me recall myself to your memory. You were present, I believe, at the first representation of The Fru Couvent, at the Francais?"

"Yes."

"Yes."

"You had a comfortable seat in the orchestrs stalls. I sat near you, exposed to a current of air from the door, and, observing my unpleasant position, you insisted upon exchanging places with me."

"It was only a simple act of duty, toward an old man and an invalid."

"The performance of such a duty, as that," returned the sick man, "is very rare. Permitme to offer you a token of my gratitude."

And, beckoning to the notary, the testator dictated a brief codicil to his will. The concluding formalities were then fulfilled, and the witnesses left the house.

The next morning the journalist called to

The next morning the journalist called to learn how the old man had passed the right. He was dead. Two days afterward at the notary's request, the journalist was present at the opening of the will. The deceased had left him a legacy of one hundred thousand france.

A School-Tragedy in England—A Boy Beaten to Death by his Teacher. The London correspondent of the New York Manufacture. York Herald writes:

The London correspondent of the New York Herald writes:

A school tragedy is just now making a vast amount of talk. It is nothing more nor less than a school-master named Thomas Hopley killing one of his pupils, a stout healthy boy of fifteen, literally by whipping him to death. A post mortes examination showed wounds on the legs where the finger of a man coud go down to the bone for three quarters of an inch, and the body and limbs covered with bruises and blood. The poor boy was besten for nearly two hours, toward midnight, and then he must have died soon after, for a great deal of noise going up and down stairs was heard during the night, and of scrubbing and cleaning by the school master and his wife, and listened to and testified to by the servants. In the morning the nervants were informed that Master Cancellor—the boy's name—had died during the night, and Mrs. Hopley said she had put a clean night shirt on the corpse and made the body comfortable." It is really the most horrifying, sickening picture of awful brutality and cruelity that I ever heard of in a civilized country. The boy was the son of a clergyman, and the school a "genteel" academy at Eastbourne; a small town of some three thousand inhabitants, on the coast between Hastings and Dover. It is shead of anything related in Dickens' novels, and one of those awful blots on English school life that makes one rejoice that there exists a satirical novelist who will lay out his talents in showing up a system that no pen can do justice to. And with as plain a prime facie case as was ever gotup, that wresched achool-misster murderer has been allowed to go out on a pality ball—himself in £1,000, and two securities of £500 each. If the Dutheboy's Halls are not all pulled down in England, so the Justice Shallows are not all extinct.

A Woman Poisons Herander sy Mestake.—

A Woman Poisons Hesself by Mistake.—
At Avon N. Y., two or three days ago, a woman who supposed she was testing maple syrup, took into her mouth a small quantity of bed bug poison, the base of which was corrosive sublimate. A domestic had the presence of mind to run to the poisoned woman with a paa of milk, of which she drank freely, afterward taking the whites of several eggs—the albumen of the milk and eggs neutralizing the poison.

COMMEMORATION OF THE ASSIVEMENT OF THE DEATH OF NAPOLEON.—On Saturday, at noon, writes a Paris correspondent, a grand mass was celebrated in the Chapel of the Tulleries, and in the Chapel of the Invalides, in commemoration of the thirty-ninth anniversary of the death of Napoleon I. The old soldiers of the Emperor have covered the railings of the Vandome Column with numberless crowns of laurely and immortelies.

A Polivical Euron Riswampin,—A. E. Burr, editor of the Hartford (Conn.) Times, has been presented, by his political friends, with a service of solid silver plate, consisting of a coffee pot, two tes pots, pitcher, cresse ewer, sugar bowl, slop bowl, and salver, of elegant design and workmanship.

Fearing they may not, we give the solution of the apparently senseless direction. It is, John Underwood, Andover, Mass.

A free negress was arrested, in Richmond, Virginia, recently, for attempting to starve to death a white child, in which she had nearly succeeded.

MECHANICS.

SIMPLE PLAN OF CONSTRUCTING BRIDGES.—
A very ingenious plan of constructing bridges and private uses, and so formed of small parts that it may be carried to any assigned place and put together at a short notice. The bridge is supposed to consist of two principal ribs made thus: The width of the place is spanned at once by an arch rising one-sixth part of its extent—its curve divided into five part of its extent—its curve divided into five parts, which are proposed to be of good seasoned oak plank, of three inches thick and twelve broad, their joint or meeting tending to the center of the arch; within this ridge is another ent ont of plank, as before, of three inches thick and nine broad, in such sort as to break the joints of the other.

In each of these ribs are made four mornices four inches broad and three high, and in the middle of the said nine inch plank; these mortices are best set out with a templet, on which they have been truly divided and adjusted. Lastly, put each principal rib in its place, driving loose keys into some of the mortices, to hold the two thicknesses together—while other help is ready to drive in the joists, which have a shoulder inward and a mortice in them outward, through in the joists, which have a shoulder inward and a mortice in them outward, through which keys being driven, the whole is kept together. On these joists, the planks, gravel, &c., are laid, and the bridge will be found suitable for rivers thirty-six feet wide. In case the river is forty or fifty feet wide. In case the river is forty or fifty feet wide, the stuff should be larger and more particularly framed. The planks ought to be four inches thick and twelve broad, in each of which are six mortices, four of them being four inches wide and two high, and through these are driven keys, which keep the ribs better together, the other two mortices are six inches wide and four high, into which are framed the joists of six inches by twelve—the tenons of these joists being morticed to receive the posts, which serve as keys. The whole being performed without iron, rusting, scaling and loosening of the parts in the course of time, are avoided, sound timber keeping tight and firm together. No part of this timber arch can yield or give way till the keys are broken short off at once.

Use of Napherba for Llumination.—It is short off at once.

Use of Naphtha for Illumination.—It is found, by careful experiment, that the only lamp in which the new rock oil, or petroleum, can be burned with auccess, is the camphene lamp, or one having a button to form the flame, and an external cone to direct the current of air, as is now used in all lamps designed to burn either camphene, resin oil, sylvic oil, or any other similar product. As the distilled product of petroleum are nearly all quite insoluble in alcohol, burning fluid—that is, a solution of the oil in alcohol—can not be manufactured from it. As a consequence, the oil can not be burned in a hand lamp, since, with an unprotected wick, itsmokes badly. Neither can it be burned in a Carcel's mechanical lamp, because a portion of the oil being more volatile than the rest, rises in vapor on the elevated wick required in that lamp, and so causes it to smoke. All the products of distillation from the copper still are found capable of burning well in the camphene lamp, except the last third or fourth part—that portion which comes off at seven hundred degrees Fahrenheit and rising, and which is thick with the crystals of paraffine. Freed from acidity by boiling on water, the oils of this distillation burn for twelve hours without injuriously coating the wick, and without indivisions. The wick may be elevated considerably above the level required for camphene, without any danger of smoking, and out smoke. The wick may be elevated considerably above the level required for camphene, without any danger of smoking, and the oil shows no signs of crusting the wick tubes with a coating of resin, such as happens with camphene and occasions so much inconvenience. The light from the rectified naphths is pure and white, without odor. The rate of consumption is less than half that of camphene, or resin oil—which fact is, of courses much in its favor.

APPARATUS FOR THE EXTRACTION OF COAL.—
It is now some considerable length of time since a contrivance was introduced into the mining districts of Germany, England and Belgium, the object of which was to prevent the great fatigue and frequent accidents experienced by miners on account of their having to descend and ascend the shafts of deep mines by means of vertical ladders, or by the tubs and tackle used in lifting the produce. This apparatus consists of two wooden beams placed in the same shaft opposite to and balancing each other, and moving up and down by an alternate vertical motion communicated by machinery. On each of these beams small sets of horizontal planks or steps are placed, the distance between each being twice the length of one lift. The miner then standing at the bottom on the ascending beam, in order to come to the pit-mouth, steps to the opposite plank, as soon as by the motion of the frame he is brought to its level, taking advantage of the short interval that elapses while the levels of the two steps are the same. He is then lifted again by the rise of this part of the frame, that on which he first stood descending, and again steps off when the lift is concluded. He then rises step by step till he reaches the top. This apparatus was a great improvement in the sourse, much in its favor. step by step till he reaches the top. This ap-paratus was a great improvement in the mode of working mines, but it is neverthe-less characterized by a serious inconvenience, as it is impossible to lift ore or coal from the shaft in which it is fixed.

shaft in which it is fixed.

A similar machine has therefore been devised, which overcomes these difficulties. Thus, for each of the wooden rods is autostituted a pair of connected rods, provided with spring catchers on which the wagons rest while being raised or lowered. One of these pairs of rods serves to raise the loaded wagons, and the other pair to lower the empty ones, on both lines the wagons are raised or lowered by successive lifts, separated by short intervals of rest, during which they remain resting on other catches, fixed in the sides of the shaft, and arranged in stages at certain appropriate distances.

Inos Diagot raom the Ore.—M. Chenot has endeavored to solve a very important problem, which has for its object the obtaining of iron directly from the ore without passing through the intermediate condition of pig. as in the Catalonian method, or without being obliged to perform two operations, and smelt the cinder. To do this theore is deoxo dized in a closed vessel at a dull red heat by the contact of a reducing gas, and there is thus obtained a porous iron to which is given the name of metallic sponge. This metallic sponge presents some remarkable properties—burning with flame at the single contact of a lighted match, the iron being transformed into oxide. M. Chenot hopes to be able to bring this sponge-like substance into a massive form, by simple compression at the usual heatemployed in forging, but his expectations in this respect have not as yet been crowned with success. IRON DIRECT PROM THE ORE .- M. Cheno

The South Demanders Territorial Slave Protection.—The Richmond Enquirer declares that the claim of the South to Federal protection for slave property in the Territories will never be abandoned. "The Southern States call upon their Northern brethren to carry out the agreement of 1856. As the Supreme Court has decided that the duty of guarding and protecting the owner in his rights exists in all the Territories, the National Democracy, in order to quiet forever the agitation of the slavery question, should embody the principle of protection in this platform, and the party be united in principle as well as organization." ""The only platform that can make the Democracy again a mational party is one that fully, unequivocally, and unambiguously recognizes the right of protection, and the duty of all the departments of the Government to afford it." """We have great hopes," concludes the Enquirer, "that the Baltimore Convent on will, in a spirit of fairness and Justice, give the Southern States to the Democracy, and not one that must hand them over to the Opposition."
